Birding Resources

Birding is a great way to connect with nature! There's no wrong way to bird. Whether you prefer to bird alone or with others, stick to your backyard or chase a rare sighting, the following resources may help you get all you can out of birding.

Birdability

Birdability features a crowd-sourced map featuring birding spots across the country. Some Lake Metroparks locations are already on the map, with more to be added in the future! Visit birdability.org

birdcast.info

Birdcast provides real-time looks at migration through live bird-tuned radar. You can also search your area and see how many birds are expected to migrate and which species you can expect to find!

Blackbrook Audubon Society

Our local Audubon chapter, Blackbrook Audubon Society promotes conservation and restoration of ecosystems with an emphasis on birds and habitat through education and advocacy within Ashtabula, Lake and Geauga Counties. For more information, visit blackbrookaudubon.org

Merlin

Powered by the Cornell Lab of Ornithology, Merlin is a birding app that features a guide to birds around the world, as well as features such as photo ID (upload a pic of a bird and it will do its best to identify it for you) and sound ID (let the app hear the sounds around you and identify any birds nearby).

Ohio Young Birders Club

Founded in 2006 by Black Swamp Observatory, the Ohio Young Birders Club's goals include creating a community for young birders throughout Ohio, promoting volunteering, fostering an interest in natural history and encouraging young people to spend more time outside. For more information, visit ohioyoungbirders.org

Get to know common residents

Becoming familiar with the area's most common birds is not only good for honing your birding abilities, but it makes observing something less common stand out even more! Below are some common birds you may encounter all year long!

Black-capped chickadee

This tiny bird is common at feeders in winter months. Look for a round grayish bird with a black cap and white cheeks.

Tufted titmouse

A small gray bird with a pointed crest, this feisty little bird is related to a chickadee and found in the same habitat.

White-breasted nuthatch

This small gray and white bird visits feeders and is distinct in its behavior of walking down tree trunks.

Blue jay

This large crested blue, black and gray bird is found in just about any habitat. It is loud and often mimics other birds like hawks.

Red-bellied woodpecker

The red belly of this medium-sized woodpecker is difficult to see. Look for a bird that's tan, black and white with red on top of its head.

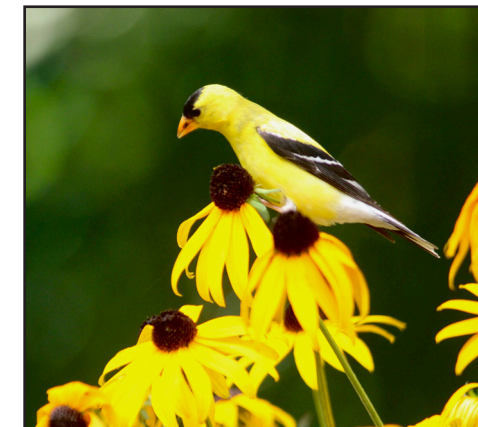

Northern cardinal

Common year-round residents, males are all red with a crest and black mask, while females are brown with red highlights.

House finch

A common feeder bird all year, house finches are a muted mottled brown. Males sport a red face and throat.

American goldfinch

Bright yellow in summer and drab in winter, the American goldfinch can reliably be identified by its black wing with light wingbars.

American robin

A stocky bird with a gray back and rusty breast. Robins often forage on the ground and are year-round residents.
